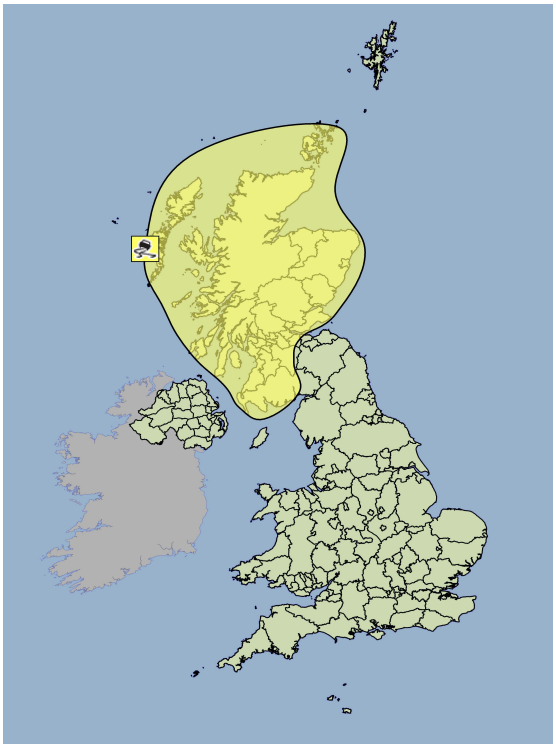
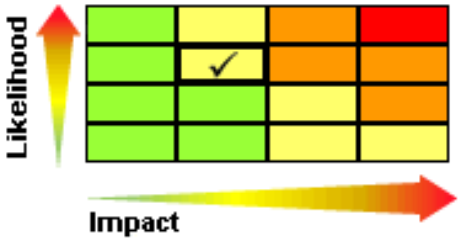
National Severe Weather Warning Service





CANCELLED

Chief Forecasters Assessment
A front has brought rain and snow to central and southern parts of Scotland. This will become confined to the more southeastern parts by morning, with clearing skies bringing a risk of ice formation on untreated surfaces. In additional, as the airmass turns colder, showers feeding into the north and northwest may fall as snow to low levels inland.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Ice

Valid from 03:00 on Thu, 14th Jan 2016 until 13:00 on Thu, 14th Jan 2016

Rain and snow will soon clear from central and southwestern parts of Scotland, leading to widespread ice developing on untreated surfaces at first this morning. Elsewhere, many surfaces are already below freezing with an associated risk of icy patches, lasting well into Thursday. In addition, some wintry showers will continue, particularly in the north and northwest, with some slight accumulations of snow in places. Please be aware of the potential for difficult travel conditions.

This is an update to the warning issued on Wednesday to extend the area further south and east following the rain and snow.
